PixSort Interview — Carlos

Conducted April 2026 · Canggu, Bali (event, informal conversation)

Background: Spanish, 24 years old Location: Canggu (2 months, staying long-term)

Content goal: Get clients for his service business Revenue: ~$700–800/month

Editor: Has one — sends organized B-roll via Google Drive

Validated Use Case — Has Workaround | Referral: Ormosi

STANDOUT INSIGHT

Carlos independently validated the editor workflow pain before hearing the PixSort pitch. He was already showing Tiffany how he organizes Google Drive for his editor — B-rolls separated from photos and videos. His unprompted line:

> "If you work with an editor, you can't just, like, give them your whole camera roll. You have to send them something."

This is the clearest independent confirmation of the core use case across all interviews — said before any pitch.

He also identified Ormosi as the real target: a larger creator with 4,000 pieces of content who would need keyword AI search to manage it all ("Ormosi Talking, Ormosi Gym, Ormosi Layla"). Carlos sees his own scale as manageable with Google Drive — but sees where that breaks down.

WORKFLOW

- Organizes content in Google Drive before sending to editor
- Separates B-roll, photos, and videos into distinct folders
- Sends editor specific B-roll — not raw camera roll access
- Uses Google Chrome to manage and review raw video files
- Happy with his current system at his scale

REACTION TO PIXSORT

- Called it "helpful" — "more colorful and more interactive" than Google Drive
- Not personally in acute pain — Google Drive works for him right now
- His framing: bigger creators and bigger teams are the real target
- No live demo — conversation only

THE ORMOSI SIGNAL

Carlos unprompted named a specific creator — Ormosi — as someone who clearly needs PixSort:

> "Ormosi maybe needs some software that has everything, because he has like 4,000 pieces of videos. So if they don't have it organized, they have to have some kind of software. So they type something — Ormosi Talking, Ormosi Gym, Ormosi Layla — and they have some keywords with AI."

4,000 videos is the scale at which Google Drive breaks down. Ormosi is a priority intro.

KEY QUOTES

> "If you work with an editor, you can't just, like, give them your whole camera roll. You have to send them something."

> "Your thing is going to be helpful because I do it in Google Drive and maybe an app is going to be better and more colorful and maybe more interactive."

> "A bigger team, a bigger company maybe needs... Ormosi maybe needs some software that has everything, because he has like 4,000 pieces of videos."

> ICP Verdict: Validated use case, but has a working workaround.
>
> Carlos already solved the editor-sharing problem with Google Drive and is content at his current scale. Not an acute user. However, he independently confirmed the core pain before hearing the pitch — the strongest external validation of the editor workflow use case across all interviews.
>
> His Ormosi referral is the most actionable output of this conversation. At 4,000 videos, Google Drive breaks down — that's exactly the tipping point where PixSort becomes a clear upgrade.
