PixSort Customer Interview — Sayu

Date: 2026-04-21 | Role: Video editor / agency co-founder | Based: India

Profile

- Role: Runs small video editing agency with partner Honey
- Age: 21
- History with Tiffany: She was one of his first clients (~2 years ago)
- Current client mix: ~90% podcasters, ~10% lifestyle — was previously doing more lifestyle
- Active clients: ~6, at capacity with a waitlist
- Client acquisition: 60% referrals, 40% outreach (LinkedIn ads + posts)

Standout Insight

He changed his entire client type to avoid the disorganization problem.

Sayu dropped lifestyle creator clients entirely and shifted to podcast editing — specifically because lifestyle clients' camera rolls were too chaotic to work with. Clients would dump 10-20 unorganized videos per day with no naming. It took 1-2 hours just to sort footage, caused missed clips, and led to client complaints. His solution: stop working with lifestyle creators altogether.

This is the editor version of "change the script." He didn't solve the problem — he eliminated the client type causing it.

His words: "If I discovered this app earlier, the ratio would have changed. I would be doing around 30-40% lifestyle and 60% podcasters."

Behavior and Workflow

- Fully standardized on Google Drive — one folder per project, managed in Motion

- Previously dealt with iCloud, Google Photos, and various platforms — too fragmented
- For lifestyle clients: used to download everything from iCloud to Drive as backup ("just in case we missed something")
- For one NGO shoot with 80-90GB of footage: spent an entire day manually renaming every file — scene 1, scene 2, scene 3
- Buys b-roll from Pexels (~$15-20/month), absorbs the cost, does not bill clients

Pain Points (As an Editor)

- Clients dump 10-20 videos per day with no naming or structure
- Constant anxiety: "Are we missing footage?" — clients frequently complain about missing shots
- Sorting chaos costs 1-2 hours per project, kills turnaround time
- Had to stop working with disorganized lifestyle clients entirely because of this
- iPhone b-roll does not exist on stock sites — has to use professional-camera footage that looks too polished for social media

Live App Test (During the Call)

Downloaded TestFlight and tested PixSort on his brother's art content and his own travel photos. Said it was organizing well. Immediately connected it to his editor workflow problem.

Bug surfaced: Cannot select all photos at once in an album — must tap each one individually. He flagged this as a clear blocker.

Product Ideas (Unprompted)

- Outfit-based grouping for fitness/studio creators: A creator shooting in the same studio wears one outfit per session. Group by outfit to differentiate days and shoots. "The chances of her doing one whole video in the same outfit is really high."
- Location-based auto-grouping: Group footage shot within a ~2-3km radius together. "By the time you reach your home it's already sorted — you just need to forward it."

B-Roll Marketplace Discussion

- Excited about the concept — sees real, unmet demand

- Key insight: iPhone b-roll is not on stock sites. Pexels only has pro-camera footage. Creator-shot iPhone content would fill a genuine gap.
- Content theft concern: has seen his own motion graphics stolen and reused — worried about re-distribution of purchased clips
- On exclusivity: doesn't care if another editor buys the same clip — geography and context make collision unlikely

Key Quotes

> "There were a lot of people who were not organized at all. We had to spend one to two hours just sorting out all the things. We just stopped working with them."

> "It takes up like one hour to get all the footage right — and we also have this thing going in our mind, are we missing any of the footages? That is a big thing."

> "If I discovered this app earlier, the ratio would have changed. I would be doing around 30-40% lifestyle and 60% podcasters. But that would have made a difference."

> "When you need footage from iPhone, it's not really there on the internet. Stock footage feels very different — it's shot on a very professional camera."

> "I can see it in organizing my little brother's stuff and most of my traveling things. I would most likely recommend it." — on recommending PixSort to clients

Product Flags for Spencer

Flag	Source
Select all photos in album — currently must tap one by one (blocker)	Surfaced during live in-call test
Outfit-based grouping for fitness/studio creators	Unprompted product idea
Location-based auto-grouping (~2-3km radius, sorts before you get home)	Unprompted product idea

iPhone b-roll marketplace — fills a gap stock sites don't cover	Confirmed demand; stock sites only carry pro-camera footage
Content re-distribution protection for marketplace	Has personal experience with stolen motion graphics

Referrals

- Honey (agency partner) — knows some lifestyle creators, good next interview
- Mani — Sayu offered to connect

ICP Verdict

Sayu is not the user — his clients are. He is a distribution channel.

Editors who work with lifestyle creators are a B2B wedge. If creators use PixSort, editors will recommend it because it solves their #1 pain. Sayu said he would actively push it to lifestyle clients and potentially re-open that segment of his business.
